The Pryor Mountains have been a part of my wilderness ways since 1980. Exploring the forest, creeks, caves, and canyons as a 9 year old boy. Hunting and fishing up there soon followed. To this day, I make a point to get up there a few times a year and hunt, fish, or explore. I can say the same about the Beartooth Mountains. Not a year has gone by without a backpacking trip to a new destination up there since I came home from military service in 1993. In the last 5 years I've learned and trekked around different places in the Crazy Mountains. I'm very disturbed by what is going on concerning public access to this beautiful mountain range. The greatest thing about all of these places is the fact that a person can get away from roads, noise from motors, power boats or whatever, and just enjoy nature. These places are much better than our national parks which have been ruined by too many roads. The national parks have sold out for almighty $$$$. Please help us keep some of these last best places from becoming another place filled with the roar of the internal combustion engine.
