Comments:

Protecting species is a critical element in protecting our ecosystems and support for human as well as wildlife. Bison are a unique and symbolic species in our country's history and deserve special and enhanced protection. Despite this, American bison have lost all 14 migration routes or corridors in the Greater Yellowstone ecosystem according to scientist Joel Berger (2004).

With human developments gobbling up more habitat, it is not enough for the Custer Gallatin National Forest to adopt a slippery guideline to "facilitate bison expansion into unoccupied, suitable habitat, management actions should not impede bison movement."

Restoring connectivity for American bison must be adopted as a forest wide standard.
